Often, people get stuck by the idea of a pre-determined destination for this. Although it is tempting for runners to distract themselves – with headphones, or conversation, or, in the gym, by watching television – I imagine myself as a kind of hunter, or even as an animal, with focus dead ahead and determination moving every step. In a courageous essay, "Walking Before Running: Towards a More Practical Judaic Studies Curriculum," Gideon Rothstein suggests that rather than the traditional Talmud-dominated focus, we might achieve a greater good for the overall Jewish community by focusing on what he calls "Educating for Jewish Adulthood. Non-profit activist. Ships in 7 to 10 business days. So much of religious literature is detailed focused; it's a real joy to engage with the broader thoughtfulness of this volume collected from the perspectives of contemporary Orthodox educators.
